A. Purpose of this handbook

It was recognised in a 2014 report by The All Party Parliamentary Group on Dementia that the number of people living with dementia amongst BME communities will increase seven-fold by 2051 (much higher than the proportional increase in number in the UK white majority population). However often due to lack of knowledge about dementia and stigma in BME communities it is more likely that people living with dementia from these communities do not present to Memory Clinics for diagnosis in the early stages of the illness. There is little research on the impact of dementia in BME communities. Cultural and language issues for these communities will be important for the diagnostic process and post-diagnostic support plans, as CNWL Trust serves some of the most ethnically diverse boroughs in the UK.

Diagnosis and post diagnostic support should include access to the relevant culturally appropriate information and support services for both the person living with dementia and their family and carers. This handbook is an information resource to help clinicians and support staff in CNWL Memory Clinics in signposting people from BME communities who are living with dementia and their families and carers to relevant information about dementia and community group resources in their area. It also contains information on local demographics and working with interpreters in dementia care.

Psychiatric Services for Black and Minority Ethnic Older People, Royal College of Psychiatrists 2009 CR156.

This document looks at the mental health needs of BME older people and the psychiatric services offered to this group, focussing on the main changes that have occurred since the original college report (CR103) published in 2001. The main areas covered include:
• Definition of BME older people.
• Demographic changes.
• Review of influential publications and policy pertaining to the mental health of BME groups in general and those specifically relevant to BME older people.
• Research involving psychiatric aspects of BME older people.
• Current examples of good practice.
• Revision of recommendations as a result of this review.

C. CNWL – The demographic picture

1. Overview
CNWL is currently commissioned to provide memory service in five West London boroughs. These services are commissioned by local Clinical Commissioning Groups (CCGs) so local commissioners decide the overall expenditure on local services and services that reflect the local priorities and financial resources of these commissioners and their local health partnerships.

Local memory services will vary in the composition of their clinical teams and support services.

The authors compared an estimate of dementia prevalence based on the census population data taken from the 2011 Census data with local CNWL memory service information on service requests for interpreters.

There is no simple relationship between language and cultural support needs in dementia and ethnicity of service users. United Kingdom (UK) first generation migrants aged over 65 who develop dementia may lose their English language skills if they have grown up mainly speaking a language other than English before migrating to the UK.

There may be problems with finding an appropriate interpreter due to historic cultural issues such as caste and nationality of the interpreter, neologisms created by the person living with dementia’s confusion of words from English and their mother tongue, English spoken in strong dialect or Patois characterising the speaker’s communications, or the speakers use of terms that have fallen out of use or significantly changed meaning since the speaker’s youth. For a number of languages there is no equivalent to the English term ‘dementia’ but only derogatory terms or phrases.

There may be cultural needs that have a bearing on social network and carer support and generally living well with dementia for some first generation migrant populations (e.g. Irish and Irish travellers, African-Caribbean) who may not need language and interpreters. support but may benefit from partnership work with a community agency. An example of such a working partnership is that between Brent Memory Services and Culture Dementia UK. It is not unusual to find second and third generation children, who have been born and brought up in the UK and may be carers of first generation migrants with dementia, and who have great difficulty in conceptualising the early life environment of the first generation migrant. Second generation migrants -who may have been encouraged to speak only in English by their parents and have become carers for those same parents who have now lost their command of English as result of dementia- can benefit from community group mediation, a role that for example has been undertaken by the Chinese National Healthy Living Centre.

This handbook contains information on websites that will provide general information on dementia and also links to audio-visual material in a variety of languages that may be more useful for people who either have never been able to read or who are unable to concentrate on text due to their dementia. When services develop translated information for local services they should always use a qualified translator. When resources can be allocated, information should be developed with the support of local community groups and people living with dementia and their carers.

Diagnostic tools such as Mini-Mental State Examination (MMSE) may need to be adapted to take account of both language and cultural issues.

D. Managing the interpreting challenges

These tips were developed from a discussion with Dr. Julia Botsford, Senior Admiral Nurse at Barnet Enfield and Haringey Mental Health NHS Trust & Research Lead for Dementia UK and Yolanda Tavera, an experienced CNWL interpreter manager

1. Tips for health professionals working with interpreters in dementia care settings

For health care professionals, effective communication with a person living with dementia is crucial but can be complex if the person or their carer/family is from a minority ethnic background. It is therefore essential to communicate with the person living with dementia via a professional qualified interpreter.

There might be problems with using relatives/carers as interpreters; the person living with dementia might not want to talk in front of a relative/carer about sensitive issues. Also, the relative/carer might not interpret accurately due to lack of specialised vocabulary or to wanting to censor the information because of embarrassment, cultural stigma or any other reason. Also be aware that they might be expressing their own views and needs. Therefore it is recommended that carers and relatives are not used as interpreters for a person living with dementia only in basic everyday encounters.

Good communication involves both verbal and non-verbal interactions. People with dementia often have difficulty pronouncing or finding the right words, or expressing ideas as words, as well as difficulty following a conversation and they often pick up on body language. Non-verbal communication means different things in different cultures. Having a professional qualified interpreter present in your interaction with a person living with dementia is therefore essential, in order to understand the individual and their culture better.

Before the interview:

- Find out the language and dialect spoken by the service user, and consider the cultural dynamics, for example, do you need to consider the age, caste, gender of the interpreter? The Interpreting Service might be able to help you with these.

- When booking the interpreter with the Interpreting Service, inform them of the nature of the interview and any specific needs of the service user. Give them as much information as possible about the interview and service user, so that they can select an appropriate interpreter for you.

- When informing the Interpreting Service of the duration of the interview, allow at least twice as much time as usual and also book the start point a few minutes before you see the service user. This will give you time to have a pre-briefing with the interpreter to check their knowledge on the subject, clarify expectations, set boundaries and give them instructions.
• Book the same interpreter for repeat appointments if you know these in advance.

• Plan the interview in advance. This is particularly important if you are meeting the service user along with family members and/or carers.

• During the pre-briefing, give the interpreter as much information as possible and explain to them what the interview will entail. Ask the interpreter about what the culture of the service user might mean in this setting: this will help you better understand the service user and their culture but also avoid misunderstandings or causing offence during the interview.

• If you are carrying out a mini mental state examination (MMSE) test and exercises, make sure you inform the interpreter at the pre-briefing. This will give you both a chance to talk about how it will work in the non-English language. For example: the service user may be asked to spell an English word and the interpreter may want to suggest a word which is written/spelt the same way in the service user’s mother tongue. (e.g. ‘hotel’ is written nearly the same in many European languages).

• Set up the room in the most convenient and effective way. You will need to face the service user at a respectful distance and at the same level to avoid intimidating them. Reduce external distractions within the room.

During the interview:

• Introduce yourself and explain your role and allow the interpreter to introduce themselves and also explain their role. Explain to the person with dementia that you are both bound by confidentiality codes. This is a good chance for you to check if the interpreter and the person with dementia actually speak the same language and dialect.

• Be aware that it is your session so you will manage the timing, structure, flow and direction of the interview. You are in control of the session.

• Never leave the interpreter alone with the service user. Remember that the interpreter has an impartial and neutral role.

• Do not engage in lengthy discussions with the interpreter. This will make the service user feel excluded, so explain to them what you are doing.

• Make sure you look at the service user and maintain eye contact, unless the interpreter has informed you in the pre-briefing that this is culturally non acceptable.

• Manage the information in smaller chunks than usual (short sentences) and allow the interpreter to advice you if you are giving too much information at a time. The interpreter will inform the service user of this intervention.

• Speak clearly and at a reasonable pace and be aware that the service user might repeat information due to reduced concentration or memory problems.
You will need to adjust your tone of voice so it is friendly and positive, and adopt a calm expression. The interpreter should mimic yours and the service user’s tone.

Use simple and straightforward language, avoid acronyms, jargon, abbreviations and technical or too specialised language.

Be specific and try not to use pronouns such as ‘he’ or ‘she’ but use the name of the person you are referring to. This will also help the interpreter.

The interpreter will use first person when interpreting (e.g. ‘I have pain here’ rather than third person reported speech ‘the patient says she has pain there’). However, if this is proving problematic or confusing for the service user, you may decide to ask the interpreter to switch to the third person reported speech, if this works better for the service user.

Although humour can help to bring you closer together, and may relieve the pressure, please be aware that the service user might have difficulty understanding humour or sarcasm, and also that these are often difficult to interpret into another language.

Allow the interpreter to interpret what you say and receive the response.

As the service user might find it difficult to find the right words or to follow the conversation, be patient and make sure that you give them plenty of time to respond. The interpreter would do the same.

Allow time between sentences for the service user to process the information and to respond. This might seem like an uncomfortable pause to you but it is important for supporting the service user to communicate.

Be aware that the answers you get from the service user might not answer your question or might seem out of context, so please do not mistrust the interpreter as they will be interpreting word for word.

Listen very carefully to the service user, using empathy, and watch their body language but also be aware of your own and the interpreter’s body language.

Do not interrupt the service user, even if you think you know what they are about to say.

Rephrase questions if you need to: try saying or asking things in different ways.

Use pictures, gestures and notes if you can and feel that these will help with communication.

Be reassuring and gentle.

Avoid using too many open-ended questions, offering too many choices and giving too much information.
If the interview is too long or you notice changes in the behaviour of the service user, consider taking a break. If the service user is tired or ill, they might have problems with concentration and their abilities to communicate. Also, they might feel confused due to the increased stress in trying to process information or make sense of things.

Allow time for the service user to ask questions and make sure they have understood any instructions or follow up issues discussed.

After the interview:

- Set up further appointments with the same interpreter if needed. This will give you and the service user a sense of continuity.
- Have a short debrief session with the interpreter as this will be beneficial to both parties.
- Do not ask the interpreter for their clinical opinion, as this is not within their remit. However, you can ask for feedback on the service user’s use of language, body language etc, and you can ask for cultural information and clarification.
- Ask the interpreter if they found the session upsetting or emotionally difficult.

2. Tips for Interpreters working with non-English speaking elders in dementia care settings

- Make sure you know the vocabulary (names of types of dementia, names of services dealing with dementia patients, names of methods used to diagnose it, etc).
- Familiarise yourself with what dementia is, types of dementia, how it is diagnosed, how the memory service works?
- Speak clearly and at a reasonable pace and advice the health professional to do so if s/he speaks too fast (and inform the service user of this intervention).
- Manage the information in smaller chunks than usual and advice the health professional to do so if s/he gives too much information at a time (and inform the service user of this intervention).
- Adjust your tone of voice and expression to mimic those of the service provider and the service user.
- Give enough time to the service user to finish what s/he is saying or respond and respect their silences.
- Remember that it is the service provider’s session and s/he will manage the timing, structure, flow and direction of the interview.
- Make sure you look at the service user when interpreting for them and to the service provider when interpreting for them.
- If the use of the obligatory first person is proving problematic with the service user, decide with the health professional to switch to the third person reported speech, if this works better for the service user (and inform the service user of this intervention).
- Advice the health professional when you need to ask subsidiary questions from the service user or rephrase a question as ways of conveying the full meaning of the health professional’s question. Keep the service user informed of these interventions.

- Dementia reduces the ability to express ideas into words and to recognise the meanings of spoken and written words, therefore be patient with the service user’s answers and respect the timing. Also you may have to mimic their body language to interpret what they say how is being said.

- If the service user utters a sentence or word in an incomplete way, do not complete it when you interpret it, but just interpret it as it was said by the service user.

- If the service user becomes aggressive, do not try to calm them down yourself. Try to keep calm and continue interpreting what both parties are saying. Follow the service provider’s instructions.

- When the mini mental state examination (MMSE) test and exercises are being carried out, resist the temptation to ‘help’ the service user, by doing the following: directing your eyes towards the answer, repeating the question, looking encouragingly to the service user, etc.

- Be aware of your non-verbal communication (body language) and remain neutral and impartial while showing empathy: If your body language is threatening, it can trigger cues for someone with dementia. Empathy and thoughtfulness are therefore very important.

- The health professional may ask you for cultural information and/or clarification. This is because they need to understand both the individual and the culture of the individual in order to avoid misunderstandings or causing offence.

- If you are aware that a MMSE test will be carried out during the session, you might want to suggest a five minutes pre-briefing with the service provider. This will give you a chance to look at how it will work in the non-English language and to talk about it with the service provider. For example: the service user will be asked to spell an English word (common in these tests to diagnose dementia) so you may want to suggest to the service provider a word which is written/spelt the same way in the service user’s mother tongue. (e.g. ‘hotel’ is written nearly the same in many European languages).

- Do not give your opinion at any time. However, if after the session you are asked by the service provider for the person with dementia’s use of language, then do give feedback. And also do inform the health professional if you found the session upsetting or emotionally difficult.

E. Key points for working with community organisations and dementia

- Some community languages have no word that is equivalent to the English term ‘dementia’ and may only have derogatory terms to describe people living with dementia. When working with interpreters either agree on a less derogatory term or phase in the community language or use the English word ‘dementia’.

- Dementia is a very stigmatised illness in some communities so people may not want to talk about it in an open public setting.

- Trust building with community groups may be a slow process that needs to be built up in steady incremental steps.

- ‘Dementia’ is often not seen as a medical problem in many communities; it may be regarded as a natural consequence of ageing, a spiritual problem or a punishment of the person by possession or by harmful forces.

- People may be taking traditional medicines and/or seeing traditional healers as well as (or instead of) using NHS services.

- Be cautious about relying on translated materials, some communities place more value on the spoken word than the written word. Also there may be those in the audience who are unable to read in the language they speak.
- Be flexible in your approach to raising awareness about dementia, use local community events or local community media to provide basic messages and information. Work with trusted communication sources in the community to plan any awareness raising events.
- Creating a structured sessional support structure such as a dementia peer support group may not be the best approach in many communities as it can be quite unlike the way that relationships of kinship, duty and social expectation are carried out. Find out what support networks are already available in your local community and work out with local community groups how you can create similar networks for dementia support or join up to an existing network.

F. Community organisations working with BME elders in five boroughs

NB. Some organisations cover more than one borough. The contact details given refer to the administrative site of the organisation so some organisations appear more than once. For example an organisation based in Brent but providing a service to Brent, Harrow and Westminster is listed here in three boroughs but operates from the same central administrative site address in Brent
