Fiona Macaulay Honored by Devex and Chevron as a “40 Under 40” Leader

List honors Washington-area young leaders in international development

OCTOBER 7, 2010, Washington, D.C. — Fiona Macaulay was named a D.C. “40 under 40” International Development Leader. The recognition, the first of its kind, was given to social entrepreneurs, advocates, private sector innovators and government and multilateral agency officials. Criteria included individual influence on the global development agenda and results achieved. Devex, the world’s largest community of aid and development professionals, and Chevron Corporation, a global energy company, announced the honor during the Business Civic Leadership Center’s annual conference.

“Many low-income youth and adults have great entrepreneurial and leadership potential; they just need access to a demand-driven package of services to succeed, both personally and professionally, and one that leverages individual and community strengths,” Macaulay said. “Delivered in the right way, the essential knowledge, skills, and attitudes can be learned and applied by those with limited literacy and formal education, especially amongst the most marginalized populations.”

Demand for Making Cents’ mission is growing, Macaulay said, as evidenced by the organization’s expansion.

“It also makes me optimistic to see that Making Cents has doubled in size over the past year, and we expect to double again over the next two years,” she said.

To continue increasing awareness of and building cooperation around its work, Making Cents convenes the annual Global Youth Enterprise and Livelihoods Development Conference in Washington, D.C. (www.youthenterpriseconference.org). Making Cents’ is also expanding youth access to financial services with its Youth-Inclusive Financial Services Linkage Program, or YFS-Link, funded by The MasterCard Foundation. One of its newest initiatives is www.yfslink.org, the new go-to site for and by the youth-inclusive financial services community.

Macaulay, who has 15 years of experience in microenterprise development, experiential learning curriculum design, facilitation, and organizational capacity building in more than 20 countries, has won various awards and honors for her involvement in the women’s small business community and youth development networks.

“A new generation of leaders in Washington, D.C. is changing the world – fighting poverty with technology and improving lives around the world with innovative approaches,” said Raj Kumar, president of Devex. “This initiative is about celebrating and supporting 40 of these inspiring young leaders who are shaking up global development and pushing our community forward.”

“Healthy businesses depend on healthy, vibrant communities,” said Gary Fisher, General Manager of Corporate Public Policy for Chevron. “Smart, strategic global partnerships, like those being fostered by the thought-leaders being honored, are a vital component of this. We applaud them, and we encourage others to follow suit.”
